THE RADIOLOGIST'S VIEW

DO YOU TREAT X-RAYS?

I received a call the other day from a referring physician.

The conversation went like this:

ME: "Hello, Dr. Sandman"

DOC: "This is Dr. Query"

ME: "Yes, hi. What's going on?"

DOC: "Can you take a look at the x-rays on my patient, Ms. Normal?"

ME: "I just read those this morning. Other than postural changes, they look normal. Why?"

DOC: "Are you sure? She is in so much pain. Can you take another look?"

ME: "OK".

2 minutes later...

"Nope, I don't see anything."

DOC: "Alright, thanks. I'll talk to you soon."

The referring doctor, still unconvinced, brings the images to a "radiology" friend who tells him the same thing. The doctor is now baffled. How could the x-rays be normal and the patient in so much pain? So, an MRI is ordered which reveals a mild disc bulge on the right at L4-5. Eureka! Just as you suspected. Unfortunately, the patient's pain is in the region of the left SI joint. There is absolutely no clinical correlation. Now what?

This scenario plays out with considerable frequency. The referring doctor does not have sufficient confidence to rely on his or her clinical skills and has expectations of having a test establish an appropriate diagnosis as opposed to confirming one. In other instances, the treating physician has a strong clinical impression but orders the incorrect test which yields a normal result. Other tests are then ordered hoping to confirm the diagnosis. By ordering additional tests, the potential of incidental findings leading to further testing, often results. This is both inappropriate, inefficient and costly. On rare occasions a diagnostic test does establish a significant incidental finding. For example, when a spinal cord tumor is found to be present on an MRI that was originally ordered after a motor vehicle accident in order to rule out a disc herniation.

Not all patients need to be x-rayed. The literature is replete with studies that find that the correlation between diagnostic imaging findings and clinical presentation, is poor. Most guidelines on the appropriate use of diagnostic imaging state the x-ray is generally not needed in patients with uncomplicated low back pain. If the x-ray, or other diagnostic imaging test, will not change the diagnosis, the treatment plan or the outcome, it may be unnecessary. It goes to the basic question of risk versus benefit. Some chiropractic physicians rationalize that an x-ray is needed to rule out contraindications to manipulation. But how often is that the case?

There is often some relief when the radiology report describes a positive finding. For example, degenerative disc disease, a spondylolisthesis or postural changes are often looked at as the cause of the patient's clinical presentation. But many of these findings may actually be incidental to the present symptoms. These patients likely had these finding way before they had symptoms and will still have these findings when they feel better. However, the treating physician has "something to hang their hat on". After all, it is better than a normal x-ray.

Although not in my best interest, it must be said that x-ray exams may be overrated. If the radiograph is normal many clinicians are puzzled as to the correct next step. If there are positive findings there is a sense of relief until it is realized that the findings really do not correlate with the clinical presentation. Improving clinical skills and staying current through continuing education will instill a greater sense of confidence in your abilities as a clinician. Then when you order ancillary tests it will not be to make a diagnosis but to confirm a suspected one.
